

Dear TEAM!

First, I want to thank you for your input. Given that this was the first time that comments from the direct report were included in managerial evaluations, no one was sure what to expect. I'll be honest with you: I was one of the managers fighting against it. Something that I recognize was simply the result of fear. Fear of change — but more importantly — fear of being forced to admit that some of my leadership qualities still need improvement.

Second, I need you to know that I'm the boss I am today because my team was not afraid of letting me know what kind of leader I could be, and was patient as I evolved. Here is another moment of honesty: I was afraid about leaving behind the only way I knew to manage.

I watched you go from an energetic and contributing team, to a bunch of brooding — well, babies — which is something I thought was inappropriate in the workplace. We give you a job. You do that job. That was my philosophy. It wasn't that I was trying to be a bully, but my behavior was based on the bosses I'd had before I was in charge. Quite frankly, I had never really thought about whether I exhibited proper leadership qualities because I was so focused on keeping you in line. I managed the way I had been managed — which is the only way I'd known before.

I now realize that there is space for both managing and leading and it is my job to find a balance of time for each. I also realized that the more that I step back and let you lead yourselves, the less leading I have to do. And honestly, that has been the best part.

Leading yourselves provides several important benefits to both the organization and to our team. The high morale in our department has not gone unnoticed and neither has the increased productivity and creativity of our work. Other managers are constantly seeking to lure you away from our team.

What I have come to realize is that our relationship has become just that: a relationship. Being able to interact, listen to, and respect each other's contributions is crucial not only to getting the work done, but also to making it exceptional in the process. Our ability to do this is built on the back of trust — something I didn't think was necessary a few years ago.

So, yes, you are the reason why I am who I am today. And again, I want to thank you for every article, book, and sideward glance you gave in those moments I stuck my foot in my mouth. I know that my success — our success — is a joint effort and has never been solely about me.

I think it's important for me to say this to you, as there will come a point in time when we will go our separate ways. There are still lots of organizations, departments, and managers who continue using top-down, command and control management styles. Some of us may even end up working for them again. You should be aware that your approach of getting me to take a long, hard look in the mirror will not work for everyone. If that is the case, your job will be in jeopardy. Your behavior was risky and while it worked out this time, do not think that it will work again. My one piece of advice is to always look for win-win approaches that do not denigrate the individual. If you don't appreciate it, most people don't either.

Change is scary, not because things will be different, but because we must be different. Even the good change we want is challenging. For most of us, starting a job here was a good change that we wanted. We applied, interviewed, and got the job. That change, while good, meant we were necessarily going to be different. Just keep that thought in mind as you continue your work toward improving your future work environments and, at times, your bosses.

I appreciate each of you and am truly thankful for opening my eyes to what the possibilities for work could be: not just a place to grind out products and services, but an opportunity to build something from a place of vision and common goals. You were right that "together everyone achieves more" when we choose to be a team rather than a group of people where it's "every man for himself." ACC

Sincerely,
TEAM Leader (formerly a boss)

Have a comment on this article? Visit ACC's blog at www.inhouseaccess.com/acc-docket.

Whitnie Wiley

LEGISLATIVE ADVOCATE FOR THE ASSOCIATION OF CALIFORNIA WATER AGENCIES (SACRAMENTO, CA), AND FOUNDER AND OWNER OF SHIFTING INTO ACTION, A COACHING AND CONSULTING FIRM FOR ASPIRING ENTREPRENEURS AND CLIENTS IN THE MIDST OF CAREER/JOB TRANSITION

whitnie@acwa.com
whitnie@shiftingintoaction.com

A wider lens on workplace law

Our lawyers come from wide and varied backgrounds, so we provide broad perspectives along with keen legal insights. Our firm has one profit center, so offices don't compete - and so clients receive practical, consistent legal service across the country. We're not the biggest firm around, and that's by design. We're agile, cost-effective, and bring the highest caliber legal talent. We are a different kind of law firm, making a difference in your workplace.

www.constangy.com

Proud sponsor of the ACC Annual Meeting since 2002

CONSTANGY
BROOKS, SMITH &
PROPHETE LLP

